He has been intricately involved in 15 major deals over 20 years and has a successful track record in leading people and organizational change through challenging times. He also brings extensive Board of Directors experience.

As Executive Vice President at Mueller Water Products, Inc., one of the largest manufacturers and distributors of fire hydrants, gate valves and other water infrastructure products in North America, Greg was responsible for leading five business units, as well as Sales and Marketing. He grew revenues 22% and expanded operating income 18% in fewer than three years. He also introduced Lean and Six Sigma methodologies, resulting in operating cost savings of $15 million per year in 2018 and 2019.

This followed his time as President of Mueller Company, one of three Presidents reporting to the CEO. In this role, he created and executed a five-year strategic plan to drive breakthrough results. He grew revenue

It is easy to think of international diplomacy as something reserved for high-level officials and grand treaties, but my familiarity with the Sister City Program has shown me that the real foundation for global understanding is built one community at a time. It's a truly brilliant concept, born after World War II from President Eisenhower's vision for "citizen diplomacy"—the idea that regular people can forge bonds strong enough to prevent future conflicts.

The ongoing work to develop and maintain these connections is less about official paperwork and more about sustained, passionate engagement. Maintaining these long-term connections requires a dedicated volunteer effort and a constantly evolving approach. Organizations like Sister Cities International push new initiatives, such as grants for economic development projects or the Young Artists and Authors Showcases to get youth involved. It's about ensuring the relationship doesn't just rest on a handshake from decades ago, but that it's actively providing mutual benefits—whether that's new trade opportunities or simply a shared understanding that makes the world feel a little smaller and a lot friendlier.
